

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

My interest in both the subject matter and the interdisciplinary method of this work arose from ongoing conversations with Carol Gilligan in a seminar on gender and democracy we have cotaught at the New York University School of Law for the past five years. At the beginning of our collaborative teaching, Carol was working on the book that would be published as The Birth of Pleasure (Alfred A. Knopf, 2002), and her thinking about tragic stories of love, rooted in patriarchy, stimulated my own thinking about my long-standing passion for the music dramas of Verdi; in turn, this led me to write Tragic Manhood and Democracy: Verdi's Voice and the Powers of Musical Art (Sussex Academic Press, 2004). Subsequently, at my request, we began a close study and discussion in the seminar of important advocates of nonviolent nonresistance, the genesis of the current work. It was Carol's brilliant critical eye and ear that guided my research and writing and gave me a resonance for my work on this project. Throughout this effort, she could not have been more generous, more supportive, and more loving. I am deeply grateful to her and to the helpful comments of our remarkable students, including Emily Bushnell, Kathy Poldneff, Julia Milstein, Jessica Kramer, Ashika Singh, Sandra Farkas, Ron Raveh, Zabrina Aleguire, Tara Herman, Lori Barret, Susanne Kandel, Catherine Hardee, and Maggie Lindsey. I am grateful as well to my friend Nicholas Bamforth, fellow in law at Queen's College, Oxford University, whose advice, during his sabbatical at the New York University School of Law, crucially assisted my research on and writing of the chapter on Churchill, which was added some time after I had completed the rest of the book; I must also thank James Gilligan for related conversations that illuminated my research. Finally, I must acknowledge the help and heartening support in revising the manuscript that I received from Gillian Berchowitz of Ohio University Press, together with the comments of a reader, as well as the comments of editors and readers I received from other presses, in particular from Elizabeth Knoll of Harvard and Douglas Mitchell of Chicago.

CONTENTS

Nonviolence in Birmingham and the March on Washington	159
Nonviolence in Selma	170
The Scope and Limits of Nonviolent Voice in King	172
CHAPTER FIVE: CHURCHILL'S RESISTING VOICE	181
Churchill's Background and Early Life	182
Churchill's Voice of Resistance	189
Churchill's Resisting Voice, Jennie's Free Sexual Voice	198
CHAPTER SIX: DISARMING MANHOOD	211
Notes	229
Bibliography	253
Index	265